The status of a barrister at the English bar is a singular one. It is not based on law nor even on concessions from the cruwn, but on "tyrant" custom. The necessity for the 30 per cent premium, on time 32 per cent institution must surely have been very great, premium, holders firm. or it nover could have been established on so firm a basis without for more opposition than it has ever encountered. It has been accorded and cherished both by the country at large and by the government too, Queen, Lords, and Commons, as though it were founded on Divine right. As an Englishman we always revered the institution, and we look on Dr. World. Bridges' attempts to traduce it, as little short of impious. We raised our voice in bitter rators of the blood ever known. He was then admitted, and after serving his terms, could not be called to the bar, until he had surrendered his faculty as Notary. This case will give our renders some idea

two of how matters really stand. Certain barristers came out liere, claiming all the rights and POSTAGE BATES and P. & O. TIME privileges which custom and offquette entitle them to in England. They found that by sacrificing the exiquette and the dignity the profession, they could make more money, and they set their wits to work to have a local ordinance passed, empowering them to act as solicitors as well as barristers; taking very good care not to lose any of the advantages which their position as barristers gave them. The Inos of Court seem to care but little what accurs so far from home, and showed no sign in the matter. The unbecoming spectaclo was presented of men claiming privileges under rules and regulations which they thomselves shimnelessly violated. And although they stood shorn by their own acts of al those rights and plains on which the privileges of their profession is based, still they have been permitted to abuse those privileges their own private purposes, by applying them to a purpose diametrically opposed to the roles in which their status is basud. At last, the bad effects of the amalgamation of the two branches of the profession became so apparent, that the Ordinance which legalise the sad step was repealed, and, as we said Labourdonnais" Fch. mail fore, come into force on the 1st January Inst. The situation is a marvel to us. Barristers have no statutory rights—they rely on custom and ctiquette. Yet here we see them destroying custom and etiquotte, and insisting on the rights which those mediums exclusively give them. The solicitors are toolish to sub mit to it-a very little firminess and combination on their part would soon put matters right.
